

Tracking the Past is an example of how American archaeology is conducted, based on work along the 112-mile Rocky Mountain Expansion Loop Pipeline. This pipeline extends from northeastern Utah, through western Colorado, and terminates in northwestern New Mexico. Along its route it intersects a variety of landscapes. For thousands of years this land supported many different cultures, each adapted to local conditions. Beginning with the earliest occupants discovered along the pipeline, the Paleoindians, the reader is led through a sample of progressively younger cultures, culminating with the first Native American groups, the Utes and Navajo, and then the modern European-Americans who built railroads, farmed and mined the area. This book draws on nearly two thousand pages of unpublished reports written about the excavations along the pipeline route. It provides a brief overview of the cultural development of the area, describes how archaeologists gather and interpret information about the past, and discusses the value of cultural resource management.

Alpine Archaeological Consultants, Inc., is a small business based in Montrose, Colorado. Founded in 1987, Alpine provides a full range of cultural resource services throughout the Rocky Mountain West, Great Basin, and southwestern states for federal and state agencies and private clients.

Williams. Funding for the Rocky Mountain Loop archaeological project and its publication was provided by Williams of Tulsa, Oklahoma, the energy company that constructed the pipeline.

Woods Canyon

Woods Canyon Archaeological Consultants, Inc., has been providing archaeological consulting services to public, private, and corporate clients in the western United States since 1982. They are based in southwestern Colorado, and most of their work focuses on the Four Corners Area.
