Water Treatment System Components

1. Introduction

The water treatment system is designed to provide clean, safe drinking water for the community. It consists of several key components that work together to remove contaminants and improve water quality.

2. System Overview

2.1. Raw Water Source

The raw water source is the initial point of water collection, typically from a river, lake, or groundwater. This water is often contaminated with various impurities, including sediment, organic matter, and inorganic minerals. The first stage of treatment involves screening and sedimentation to remove these large particles and settleable solids.

Following sedimentation, the water undergoes coagulation and flocculation. Chemicals like alum or ferric chloride are added to the water, causing fine suspended particles to clump together into larger flocs that can be more easily removed during sedimentation.

3. Filtration

The filtered water then passes through a series of filtration stages. The first stage is typically rapid sand filtration, where water flows through a bed of sand that traps remaining suspended solids. This is followed by activated carbon filtration, which uses the adsorptive properties of carbon to remove organic compounds, taste, and odor. Finally, the water may pass through a membrane filtration stage, such as reverse osmosis, to achieve the highest level of purity.
