

The importance of the availability of water and sanitation is well established, and improved technologies are being developed for the production of water and sanitation for all city dwellers everywhere for any country. Development, however, is not enough. The provision of water and sanitation services is also important and will require provision along with other services. The water supply network, which is government-owned, is not necessarily connected to the sewerage system. It is recommended that a decentralized approach, in which a government agency is provided. This approach will be consistent with the aims of the Strategy of Local Authorities. It also allows continued development in developing countries, which have developed the technology required for water supply. It is recommended that the water supply network be provided by the local authority.

Water and Sanitation Services Provisioning Paul Kariuki,2010-12 The importance of the availability of water and sanitation is not debatable National and international development agencies recognize the importance of water and sanitation for not only human consumption but also economic development However in most places the provision of water and sanitation services is poor Inequities also exist in service provision mostly in urban settlements The supply driven approach which is government driven is not addressing consumer demands fully It is recommended that a demand driven approach one which is consumer driven be promoted This approach puts the consumer at the centre of the delivery of basic services It also allows consumers to participate in decision making processes and recognizes that consumers come first in service delivery Furthermore it encourages them to honour their obligations by paying for the services received British Medical Journal ,1904

Ginnekan,2012 This note presents tools that can help make service providers more accountable to the people they serve The voice of users is often muted in water utilities One consequence is that utilities do not take account of users priorities and preferences The utility in turn loses the trust and cooperation of the community that it is supposed to serve The result is often service deterioration further alienating users Traditionally users relied on politicians to maintain oversight of budgets and compliance with rules and to intervene on their behalf when services failed This institutionalized a long route of accountability from user to political representative to service provider Modern approaches to public management seek to hold service providers more directly accountable to their users for the outcomes of their work Providers are expected to ensure that water flows safely and reliably from taps that blocked drains are cleared and that services are accessible and affordable to all Accountability in this context is about establishing a direct short route between users and service providers Tools for accountability cannot by themselves provide sustainable water services But their use can contribute to this goal by improving utility practices and the utility s policy and institutional environment Moving from Protest to Proposal ,2004

National Consumer Council ,1993 Regulating Water and Sanitation for the Poor Richard Franceys,Esther Gerlach,2012-05-04 This excellent book makes a major contribution to the literature on regulation in a pro poor direction for urban water supply It is extremely relevant for policy makers striving to achieve the Millennium Development Goal for halving the share of world s population without access to clean and affordable water Andrew Nickson University of Birmingham UK The aim of this book is to present the potential benefits as well as the challenges of introducing a more formal economic regulatory process into the urban water sector arena in lower income countries There is a particular focus upon the impact this may have on the poorest the informal slum and shanty dwellers of the rapidly growing cities Economic regulation usually introduced in the context of private operation of monopoly water supply can deliver objectivity and transparency in the price setting process for public as well as private providers The book describes and analyses these issues through a consideration of ten country case studies As a starting point the current situation for the provision of water and sanitation services for the poorest through non regulated public providers in India and Uganda is reviewed Comparative chapters are then presented on Ghana Philippines Bolivia Jordan Zambia and Indonesia all with varying degrees of private sector involvement and regulation Finally the experiences of two richer countries are considered Chile and England countries with the longest experience of economic regulation and the most privatized suppliers In all cases there is a focus on the very necessary role of customer involvement in price setting and service monitoring and on the role of alternative private service providers Exit, Voice, Loyalty and Structural Silence Charisma Acey,2009 Serving All Urban Consumers: PREPP-utility consultation with the urban poor Kevin Sansom (M.
