The Man from Archangel and Other Tales of Adventure

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, I THE D BUT OF BIMBASHI JOYCE It was in the days when the tide of Mahdism which had swept in such a flood from the great Lakes and Darfur to the confines of Egypt had at last come to its full and even begun as some hoped to show signs of a turn At its outset it had been terrible It had engulfed Hicks s army swept over Gordon and Khartoum rolled behind the British forces as they retired down the river and finally cast up a spray of raiding parties as far north as Assouan Then it found other channels to east and to west to Central Africa and to Abyssinia and retired a little on the side of Egypt For ten years there ensued a lull during which the frontier garrisons looked out upon those distant blue hills of Dongola Behind the violet mists which draped them lay a land of blood and horror From time to time some adventurer went south towards those haze girt mountains tempted by stories of gum and ivory but none ever returned Once a mutilated Egyptian and once a Greek woman mad with thirst and fear made their way to the lines They were the only exports of that country of darkness Sometimes the sunset would turn those distant mists into a bank of crimson and the dark mountains would rise from that sinister reek like islands in a sea of blood It seemed a grim symbol in the southern heaven when seen from the fort capped hills by Wady Halfa Ten years of lust in Khartoum ten years of silent work in Cairo and then all was ready and it was time for civilisation to take a trip south once more travelling as her wont is in an armoured train Everything was ready down to the last pack saddle of the last camel and yet no one suspected it for an unconstitutional Government has its advantages A great administrator had argued and managed and cajoled a great soldier had organised and planned and made piastres do the work of pounds And then one night these two master spirits met and clasped hands and the soldier vanished away upon some business of his own And just at that very time Bimbashi Hilary Joyce seconded from the Royal Mallow Fusiliers and temporarily attached to the Ninth Soudanese made his first appearance in Cairo Napoleon had said and Hilary Joyce had noted that great reputations are only to be made in the East Here he was in the East with four tin cases of baggage a Wilkinson sword a Bond s slug throwing pistol and a copy of Green s Introduction to the Study of Arabic With such a start and the blood of youth running hot in his veins everything seemed easy He was a little frightened of the General he had heard stories of his sternness to young officers but with tact and suavity he hoped for the best So leaving his effects at Shephard s Hotel he reported himself at headquarters It was not the General but the head of the Intelligence Department who received him the Chief being still absent upon that business which had called him Hilary Joyce found himself in the presence of a short thick set officer with a gentle voice and a placid expression which covered a remarkably acute and energetic spirit With that quiet smile and guileless manner he had undercut and outwitted the most cunning of Orientals He stood a cigarette between his fingers looking at the new comer
