

The largest of the population surveys, the National Survey of Drug Use and Health (NSDUH) of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), has implemented several methodological improvements over its predecessor, the National Household Survey of Drug Abuse, to increase response rates and improve data quality, but it continues to miss a large fraction of those with the most serious drug abuse problems.

Increasingly, new methodologies are being used to reach and survey hidden populations. Yet there has been little research on the strengths, weaknesses, and best practices of the methodologies. There are important questions about the impact of respondent incentive payments on research participation that would be valuable. Also missing in current work is attention to explicitly coordinating the NSDUH with other high-quality datasets in areas important to substance abuse.

Monitoring the Future (MTF), the long-term and ongoing study of the behaviors, attitudes, and values of U.S. secondary school students, college students, and young adults, supported by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, continues to collect potentially valuable longitudinal data each year. The committee endorses the recommendation of a previous NRC committee for the National Institute on Drug Abuse to find ways to provide wider research access to the MTF data.

Indicator Systems

There have been major losses of indicator systems in recent years, especially the Arrestee Drug Abuse and Monitoring (ADAM) system of the U.S. Department of Justice, which studied criminally active drug offenders and was ended in 2003. ADAM was restarted by the Office of National Drug Control Policy, but only in 10 cities. It is less important for the data it provides on the levels of drug use among arrestees than it is as a platform for studying the behavior of the population that may account for a very large proportion of cocaine, heroin, and methamphetamine used in the United States. It appears impossible to develop estimates of the quantities used and expenditures on illegal drugs without data from these populations.

HHS's Treatment Episode Data System (TEDS), originally developed as an administrative dataset, has become an increasingly valuable research tool in understanding changing patterns of illegal drug use. It provides a large-sample dataset on the circumstances of individuals entering substance abuse treatment. The recent addition of a discharge dataset to supplement the admissions dataset may provide an important new source of information for understanding drug use.

TEDS might be made more valuable through the inclusion of individual identifiers, including specific sociodemographic identifiers, or by

Understanding The Demand For Illegal Drugs:

Understanding the Demand for Illegal Drugs National Research Council, Division of Behavioral and Social Sciences and Education, Committee on Law and Justice, Committee on Understanding and Controlling the Demand for Illegal Drugs, 2010-10-23 Despite efforts to reduce drug consumption in the United States over the past 35 years drugs are just as cheap and available as they have ever been Cocaine heroin and methamphetamines continue to cause great harm in the country particularly in minority communities in the major cities Marijuana use remains a part of adolescent development for about half of the country's young people although there is controversy about the extent of its harm Given the persistence of drug demand in the face of lengthy and expensive efforts to control the markets the National Institute of Justice asked the National Research Council to undertake a study of current research on the demand for drugs in order to help better focus national efforts to reduce that demand This study complements the 2003 book Informing America's Policy on Illegal Drugs by giving more attention to the sources of demand and assessing the potential of demand side interventions to make a substantial difference to the nation's drug problems Understanding the Demand for Illegal Drugs therefore focuses tightly on demand models in the field of economics and evaluates the data needs for advancing this relatively undeveloped area of investigation
