On the contrary, Congress has been so preoccupied with the Vietnam conflict that it has not authorized the new Education Rights Amendment. The bill was reported in 1970, but after 13 years it remains in limbo.

Moreover, Massachusetts, representing that the idea has already been tried and failed, has not even introduced legislation which would allow non-unionized teachers to join a union. The state has a public employees' union, but it is not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Nevertheless, that congressional bill has been passed by the House of Representatives, and the Senate has passed a similar bill. The Education Rights Amendment is now in the hands of the President. He has not yet signed it.

There is some reason to think that he will. He has signed the Equal Employment Opportunity Act, the Fair Housing Act, and the Voting Rights Act. He has also signed the Education Rights Amendment.

There is no other legislation now in the House or the Senate which would give teachers the right to join a union. The only other bill in the House is the Education Rights Amendment. It is the only bill in the Senate which would give teachers the right to join a union.
