Ensuring the Health of Vulnerable Populations in the United States John Michael Connolly, 2010 The results demonstrate that evacuation behavior receipt of safety information chronic illness and disability housing and socioeconomic status all contributed to racial disparities These findings should inform future emergency management policies in order to mitigate these health threats among African American communities Paper 3 reexamines the effect of self interest on public opinion about health policy issues and investigates the possibility that meager self interest effects found in previous research may have resulted from the manner in which these studies have defined self interest The analysis also explores the potential moderating effects of the unique political and economic conditions of 2008 on the influence of self interest Data for this paper are from a survey of residents of Florida and Ohio two swing states in which many residents felt the earlier effects of the most recent economic recession The results indicate that multiple measures of self interest including a previously unused measure regarding difficulties paying medical bills had statistically significant and sizeable effects on attitudes about universal health insurance United States Participation in the United Nations United States.
