Of the growing importance of this marketing discipline, commentators are in accord, but of its scope, to date, opinions are still split. Some regard it as being primarily concerned with the requirements of sales before, during, and after the purchasing process. The Institute of the Society for Marketing Studies (1990) defines the discipline as the study of the relationship between the consumer and the product. This view is in the majority, but not all agree. Others regard it as being concerned with consumer behaviour, but others still view it as being concerned with the product. "Good" being someone who "is doing something about the world that makes a difference" and "bad" being someone who "is not doing anything about the world that makes a difference." The concept of "being good" is thus defined in terms of one's actions, not one's character. This is a very different way of thinking about morality than the traditional view, which holds that one is good or bad by nature, regardless of one's actions.
