Inside the Black Box:

Assessment for Learning in the Classroom

In their widely read article “Inside the Black Box,” Mr. Black and Mr. William demonstrated that improving formative assessment raises student achievement. Now they and their colleagues report on a follow-up project that has helped teachers change their practice and students change their behavior so that everyone shares responsibility for the students’ learning.

BY PAUL BLACK, CHRISTINE HARRISON, CLARE LEE, BETHAN MARSHALL, AND DYLAN WILLIAM

IN 1998 “Inside the Black Box,” the predecessor of this article, appeared in this journal.¹ Since then we have learned a great deal about the practical steps needed to meet the purpose expressed in the article’s subtitle: “raising standards through classroom assessment.”

In the first part of “Inside the Black Box,” we set out to answer three questions. The first was, Is there evidence that improving formative assessment raises standards? The answer was an unequivocal yes; a conclusion based on a review of evidence published in over 250 articles by researchers from several countries.² Few initiatives in education have had such a strong body of evidence to support a claim to raise standards.

This positive answer led naturally to the second question: Is there evidence that there is room for improvement? Here again, the available evidence gave a clear and positive answer, presenting a detailed picture that identified three main problems: 1) the assessment methods that teachers use are not effective in promoting good learning, 2) grading practices tend to emphasize competition rather than personal improvement, and 3) assessment feedback often has a negative impact, particularly on low-achieving students, who are led to believe that they lack “ability” and so are not able to learn.

PAUL BLACK is a professor emeritus, Department of Education and Professional Studies, King's College London, where CHRISTINE HARRISON is a lecturer in science education. CLARE LEE is a teacher advisor for the Warwickshire County Council. BETHAN MARSHALL is a lecturer in English education, Department of Education and Professional Studies, School of Education, King's College London. DYLAN WILLIAM is director of the Learning and Teaching Research Center, Educational Testing Service, Princeton, N.J. They wish to thank the Medway and Oxfordshire local education authorities and the schools directly involved in the project described here, especially the teachers who shouldered the greatest burdens. The work on which this article is based was supported by grants from the Nuffield Foundation and from the U.S. National Science Foundation, as part of the Stanford University Classroom Assessment Project to Improve Teaching and Learning (CAPITAL). But the opinions expressed are those of the authors. © 2004, Dylan William.
