1. Introduction

Water is a vital resource for human survival and economic development. However, water pollution has become a global issue, threatening public health and the environment. Therefore, it is essential to develop effective water treatment technologies to ensure the safety and quality of drinking water.

2. Materials and Methods

2.1. Materials

The water samples used in this study were collected from various sources, including municipal water supply, rivers, and lakes. The samples were filtered through a 0.45 µm membrane filter to remove suspended solids. The filtered water was then stored in clean, sterilized bottles for further analysis. The pH of the water samples was measured using a pH meter, and the total dissolved solids (TDS) were determined using a TDS meter.

The water treatment system used in this study consisted of a pump, a filter, and a storage tank. The pump was used to draw water from the source and push it through the filter. The filter was made of activated carbon and was used to remove organic matter and other contaminants. The storage tank was used to store the treated water for further use.

2.2. Methods

The water treatment system was operated at a flow rate of 1 L/min. The water was drawn from the source, passed through the filter, and then stored in the storage tank. The treated water was then used for various purposes, including drinking, washing, and irrigation. The effectiveness of the water treatment system was evaluated by measuring the concentration of various contaminants in the treated water.
