Abstract
This research is an exploratory study of the experience of women in the United States who have been sexually abused by their partners. The study was conducted in a qualitative manner, using in-depth interviews with 15 women. The results of the study suggest that women who have been sexually abused by their partners experience a range of psychological and physical problems. The most common psychological problems reported were post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, and anxiety. The most common physical problems reported were headaches, stomach problems, and problems with sleep. The study also found that women who have been sexually abused by their partners are more likely to have problems with self-esteem and to have a negative view of men. The study suggests that women who have been sexually abused by their partners need support and treatment to help them deal with the psychological and physical problems that they experience.
