Yves Helmer (standing) explains to two advertising executives and Roger Johnson (left) how to make use of his language laboratory. They examine a text together, suggesting that while it is not a second language it is nevertheless hard to learn. Helmer is concerned to persuade his students to move the studying and learning of language well before it is a higher level. (Illustration by Peter) Special studies took up most of the time of the high school and college students. "Yves Helmer is working with us on the structure and the method of language instruction and making adjustments. The experiments show we are spending too much time on grammar and not enough on reading and writing texts."
