Adult Mental Disorders

INTRODUCTION

Burden of Disease

Mental disorders are a diverse group of conditions that primarily impair cognition, emotions, and behavioral control; occur early in life; and have a high aggregate prevalence in all countries where epidemiology has been investigated (Demyttenaere and others 2004; Kessler, Berglund, and others 2005; WHO 1992). The combination of high prevalence, early onset, clinical course that is either chronic or remitting and relapsing, and impairment of critical brain functions makes mental disorders a major contributor to the global disease burden discussed in chapter 2 in this volume (Whiteford and others 2015). The greatest fraction of the burden results from years lived with disability (YLDs), particularly for ages 15–49 years—a critical life interval for completing education, starting a family, and increasing productivity at work (figure 4.1) (WHO 2014b). The global cost of mental health conditions is projected to be as high as US$6 trillion by 2030, of which 35 percent would be contributed by low- and middle-income countries (LMICs) (Bloom and others 2011).

Although mental disorders directly account for fewer than half of one percent of all deaths, they contribute significantly to premature mortality through multiple medical causes (discussed in chapter 3 in this volume, Charlson and others 2015) and are a major risk factor for suicide (WHO 2014c; chapter 9 in this volume, Vijayakumar and others 2015). An estimated

8 million deaths annually due to medical conditions are attributable to mental disorders (Walker, McGee, and Druss 2015).

Mental disorders are associated with social stigma in many countries and cultures (Weiss and others 2001). The slow emergence of scientific explanations for the etiologies of mental disorders and the mistaken belief that symptoms reflect either a lack of will power or some moral failure facilitate negative attitudes and discrimination. Patients with psychotic symptoms can seem frightening, but persons with mental illnesses are far more likely to commit suicide than homicide and to be victims of crimes than perpetrators (The Lancet 2013; Walsh and others 2003). Shame and fear are substantial obstacles to help-seeking, diagnosis, and treatment. Individuals with mental disorders are often imprisoned, without access to adequate care, for minor legal transgressions that result directly from their illnesses. In many mental hospitals and other settings, people with these disorders may not be accorded basic human rights. Stigmatization has contributed to disparities in availability and access to care and medications and insurance coverage, as well as research funding, compared with other chronic illnesses (Wang, Aguilar-Gaxiola, and others 2007).

This chapter updates data on the disease burden, as well as interventions to treat the four leading contributors to adult mental illness globally—schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, depressive disorders, and anxiety disorders. These were selected because of their high contribution to the global disease burden, accounting
