

children who require time to turn in one direction, stop and start in a fairly specific area, and then continue in a different direction. Kaplan (196) recognized the importance of this ability to stop and change direction and noted that its absence is often associated with pathology in older children. However, deviations in corners of the square occur too frequently throughout the age range of the present sample for the authors to regard them as criteria for success on the form. It appears that most children are at least 6 years old before they can produce four good corners. Actually, diamonds appear to be more indicative of stop-and-go ability, inasmuch as both curves and acute turns are required.

Four-sidedness seems to be the better criterion for success on the square. Especially, this criterion provides the simplest and most reliable basis for scoring. The authors' experience supports Yessierli's (197) argument that the perception of spatial relationships among the sides of the square is closely related to achievement on this form. The following developmental trend supports this argument:

Some children copy a square in the following fashion. Such constructions indicate that these children have seen the corners and realize something should be done about them. However, despite the ability to perceive and to reproduce the straight vertical and horizontal lines of which the square is composed, they have not been able to organize these components. If they had been able to do so, they would have at least drawn something like this. Children who organize the lines in such a manner nearly always go on to complete four corners.
