

A p-n junction diode connected in series to the load resistor is essentially a half way rectifier. With the diagrams below, we can see an alternating current as the input; the input voltage is displayed as a step down transformer & the resultant is a reduced output of the transformer that gives to the diode & load resistor.

The next diagram displays a half wave rectifier with an inclusion of a capacitor, which produces a smoother output. Essentially, a greater load current will discharge the capacitor rapidly, which upsurges the amount of ripples gained. However, in a half way rectifier circuit, it's not really useful to reduce the ripple voltage by smoothing the capacitor, but, it'll be most beneficial in a full wave rectifier.

The raw DC delivered by a rectifier on its own would consist of a sequence of half sine waves with the voltage altering between zero and $\sqrt{2}$ times the RMS voltage; but this does not include any diodes & other losses. Furthermore, a supply of this type wouldn't be much use for powering circuits due to the fact that analogue circuits would contain a large level of ripples that are covered on the output, & digital circuits wouldn't be able to work as the power is removed every time there is a half cycle.

To smooth the output of the rectifier a reservoir capacitor is used which is placed across the output of the rectifier & is parallel with the load; Normally, the capacitor charges up when the voltage from the rectifier rises above that of the capacitor & as the rectifier voltage depletes, the capacitor offers the required current that comes from its stored charge.

flows through the load.

During the negative half cycle, diodes 3 & 4 now conduct in series, however diodes 1 & 2 are switched off since they're now reverse biased; the direction of the current flowing through the load is unchanged. As the current flows through the load, the path is only in one direction, so the voltage created across the load is also in one direction, which is the same for the last 2 diodes in the full wave rectifier.

The diagram on the left is a full wave rectifier circuit that consists of 4 diodes that are arranged in series pairs with only 2 diodes conducting current during ever half cycle. So, during the positive half cycle, the diodes that are pointing downwards (Diodes 1 & 2) conduct in series, whereas the other diodes pointing in the right hand side direction (Diodes 3 & 4) are reversed biased & the current
