

One of the two exposures of Vilnius' Pastoria has survived. Unlike most, it is built as a corner of wood and has three gables which are used for sheltering the garden. In fact, only the backwing gable was altered to stone, giving it the appearance of a separate structure to some extent. The cultural phenomenon required to create this house, where practical houses were constructed, linked the past of domestic and liturgical buildings, representing a unique fact.

This uniquely surviving structure is known as a corner house – a combination of separate and complete houses being built about this. In the early twentieth century the corner house below was used as a small chapel, a structure known as a chapel that was built separately. Looking into contemporary use, it is now abandoned and seriously deteriorating.
