

human. We live through many experiences, but if we do not reflect on them and reconstruct their meaning (and we usually do not), they bypass our consciousness and are stored in the subconscious until an event triggers them and brings them back to life. So reflection on personal experiences has always helped me to understand and value the stories on my journey as important and worthwhile in my spiritual and intellectual development. Polanyi says,

As human beings, we must inevitably see the universe from a center lying within us and speak it in terms of a human language shaped by the exigencies of human intercourse. Any attempt rigorously to eliminate our human perspective from our picture of the world must lead to absurdity.²

If we do not value our experiences that are deep within ourselves, we will always feel estranged and alien to ourselves. And as Oscar Wilde rightly said, denial of our experiences will be like the denial of the soul. We as spiritual beings know what denial of the soul means. We know the pain of separation that is caused by denial of the soul. I realized the importance of reflection on personal experiences and have included them in my writings and my research since I was a doctoral student at the University of Toronto. As I was doing my studies there, I realized that I was denying my soul and my spiritual experiences and separating them from my intellectual experiences and my professional life, as if I had two separate lives. I will elaborate on this issue later in this chapter to share with the reader the confusion and pain caused by such denial.

Research and thinking are always based on personal concerns. Even when the issues that preoccupy us, as researchers, are mainly social, political, spiritual, or affect humanity in general, there are always highly personal reasons why these more universal issues mean so much to us. Since 1988 I have kept asking myself why I am preoccupied by Islamic epistemology and Islamic education. I never had a particular interest in Islamic issues. I had always been a practicing Muslim, as I was brought up in a conservative Muslim home by loving and open-minded parents. So religion was not an issue for me. I accepted and practiced it as part of my daily life.
