&c Geological Survey of Great Britain,1911 Tumours in a Tropical Country A. C. Templeton,2012-12-06 The geography of medicine is a classical subject that can be studied wherever medicine is practised and the population counted It has already contributed a great deal to knowledge of the causes of disease and it might be thought that the subject had little more to teach This however is unlikely First there are many parts of the world that have only recently been provided with the full range of diagnostic services Secondly it is now realised that the observation that a disease occurs only very rarely under some conditions can be just as important as the observation that it occurs very often under others Thirdly the spread of industrialization has not yet eliminated the wide variety of conditions of life that has been produced by different cultures and different standards of living We have still an opportunity to determine their effect on the incidence of disease but not perhaps for long That an interest in the geography of cancer can pay dividends is shown by many examples ranging from the relationships between cancer of the buccal cavity and chewing habits and between cancer of the lung and smoking to the current enquiries relating Burkitt's lymphoma to malaria cancer of the oesophagus to the consumption of maize beer cancer of the liver to food contaminated with aflatoxin and cancer of the large bowel to the dietary content of fibre and fat
