

Aeolian Harp

By Dennis D. Dorogi

ALMOST UNKNOWN today, the aeolian harp works on a principle that was familiar as far back as biblical times. It is recorded that King David liked to hang his harp over his bed when retiring, so he'd be lulled to sleep by the sound produced as the night breezes played over the strings.

WHEN STRINGS are stretched at one end to headless nails driven at an angle into the end block to set up varying patterns of vibration. Basically, this harp consists of a long narrow sound box over which a dozen nylon guitar strings are stretched—four Gs, four Bs and four Es. They are attached to headless nails at one end and tuning pins at the other. These pins are designed to hold strings at the opposite end, allowing you to adjust tension with a tuning wrench.

for use in auto-harps and others, and can be ordered at most music stores. Order a tuning wrench at the same time, since this is required to turn them. If desired, brass screws, drilled crosswise to hold the strings, may be substituted for the pins. All strings should be tuned to the same note, usually a low G.

The length of the sound box isn't important, as the instrument can be designed to fit any window. Place it on the sill and lower the window so it rests on the cover and holds the harp in place. The sound cover directs strong air current over the strings, producing an ethereal sound which varies with the wind intensity.

REMOVING COVER shows wind over angled surface of sound box. Nail pins in grooves to help in tuning.
