

Abstract

These two strategies are a common, practical way to achieve the desired results. The first strategy is to use a "strong" or "high" level of abstraction, which is a more general, high-level view of the system. The second strategy is to use a "weak" or "low" level of abstraction, which is a more specific, low-level view of the system. Both strategies can be used to achieve the desired results, but the choice of strategy depends on the specific requirements of the system.
