

UG8 GOVERNOR

DIAL CONTROL PART ONE GENERAL INFORMATION — INSTALLATION — ADJUSTMENT—OPERATION

Cut No. 1

GENERAL: The UG8 dial type governor is of the hydraulic type and is normally isochronous (will maintain same engine speed regardless of engine load). Speed adjustment (synchronizer), speed droop and load limit controls are standard features. The stalling work capacity of the governor is eight foot pounds.

THE SYNCHRONIZER, or speed adjusting control, is used to change the engine speed when running alone or to change the engine load when the engine has been paralleled with other units. The synchronizer indicator located directly below the synchronizer merely indicates the number of revolutions of the synchronizer knob.

THE SYNCHRONIZING MOTOR: A synchronizing motor may be mounted on a special cover for the UG8 governor to provide remote speed control. Its use enables the switchboard operator to match the frequency of an engine driven alternator with that of other units, or a system, before synchronizing and to change load distribution after synchronizing.

The motor used is of the split field, series wound, reversible type. It can be used on either direct cur rent or alternating current at its specified voltage. It should be wired as shown on page 32.

A friction type coupling is provided between the motor shaft and the synchronizer adjusting gear to allow the engine operator to adjust speed by turning the synchronizer control knob on the governor. For adjustment of the friction coupling see page 17.

THE SPEED DROOP control can be set to automatically divide and balance load between engines driving the same shaft, or paralleled in an electrical system.

Droop is incorporated in the governor through a linkage which varies the compression of the speeder (speed adjusting) spring as the terminal shaft rotates. Increased fuel reduces spring compression, reduces the governor speed setting accordingly, and the unit will gradually reduce its speed as load is applied. This relationship between load and speed acts as a resistance to load changes when the unit is interconnected with other units either mechanically or electrically.

As droop is reduced toward zero the unit becomes able to change load without changing speed. As a general rule, units running alone should be set on zero droop, interconnected units should be run at the lowest droop setting that will give satisfactory load division.

A. C. generating units tied in with other units should have droop set sufficiently high (30 to 50 on the dial) to prevent interchange of load between units. If one unit in the plant, or system, has enough capacity, its governor may be set on zero droop and it will regulate the frequency of the entire system. This unit will take all the load changes within the limits of its capacity and will control frequency if its capacity is not exceeded.

The system frequency is adjusted by operating the synchronizer of the governor having zero droop. The distribution of load between units is accomplished by operating the synchronizers of the governors having speed droop.

THE LOAD LIMIT control hydraulically limits the load that can be put on the engine by restricting the angular terminal shaft rotation of the governor, and consequently, the quantity of fuel supplied to the engine. The control may also be used for shutting down the engine by turning it to zero. CAUTION: Do not manually force engine linkage to increase fuel without first turning load limit knob to 10.

INSTALLATION: When the governor is installed on the engine, particular care should be exercised to see that it is mounted squarely and that the drive connection to the engine is aligned properly. A gasket should be placed between the base of the governor and the mounting pad on the engine. If the governor is equipped with a serrated drive shaft, it should slip
