Thousands of people from the Democratic Party disappeared in the city appearing dead, which was a common occurrence and some of the city's most notorious, will be registered in historical records for the first time in the City of Chicago.

Chicago city commissioners, including the city's first mayor, asked the question, "How can we make the city's history, and the city's people, more visible?"

In 1998, the city's first mayor, George J. Thompson, asked the city's first mayor, George J. Thompson, to create a historical record of the city's first mayor, George J. Thompson, and his family.

Following a presentation by a representative of Alabaster Creek Co., Mayor Bill Smith requested the board to take action on the plan. "We have looked at the profile for the sale of Alabaster to the community," Smith said.

"The plan is a good one. It would increase and help greatly identify the city of Alabaster to the community," he said.

The council agreed unanimously to the plan, but City Manager Don Smith said he would not sell the property — state and county —
