Of the growing importance of this work, the position of universities is important, but it is also clear that the university should not be regarded as the sole source of training during the early part of the working life. The nature of the things that have to be done is changing so rapidly that the university has to be a permanent source of new men for the industry that cannot learn, any more in the traditional manner, on the job. It is difficult to find the balance between training suitable for immediate industry and training more often in scientific and general particular science to the student in the middle of his training. "Good" being someone who "is doing something about the world that makes a difference" and "bad" being someone who "is not doing anything about the world that makes a difference." The concept of "being good" is thus defined in terms of one's actions, not one's character. This is a very different way of thinking about morality than the traditional view, which holds that one is good or bad by nature, regardless of one's actions.
