

imply that actual spending could be less than the budgetary allocations. For example Ablo and Reinnikka (1998) undertook an empirical study in Uganda which involved tracking public expenditure from the centre to primary schools. The study revealed that save for salary and wage allocations, more than 70 percent of the budgetary allocations was never received by the schools but rather spent on activities unrelated to primary education. Furthermore the 2004 World Bank's Development Report reports that at least 30 percent of the drugs allocated to public health facilities were diverted to private use in Cameroon, Tanzania and Uganda. Under such circumstances it is not surprising that public spending is inversely related to economic growth.

Furthermore, bureaucratic corruption may lead to an increase in the quantity of public services while compromising the quality of public services. This is because delivering new public services increases the likelihood of a higher bureaucratic loot as compared to say maintaining existing public services. In a cross-country empirical study, Tanzi and Davoodi (1997) argue that bureaucratic corruption compromises incentives to maintain public infrastructure or services while increasing the quantity of public services. In addition, Holmberg and Rothstein (2010) highlight that high public investment only acts as one of the ingredients to enhance the quality of public services. Where the quality of institutions is low (where corruption levels are high) high levels of public investment could potentially result in low quality public services. Using quality of water as a measure of the quality of public services, Holmberg and Rothstein (2010) argue that high corruption levels or low levels of institutional quality offset the potential increase in the quality of public services resulting from increased public investment especially in developing economies.

The preceding discussion unambiguously shows that corruption affects the quality of public services available to citizens. The existence of poor quality public services may drive individuals to seek for services from among others the private sector by-passing the nearest public service point. Akin and Hutchison (1999) show evidence of both rich and poor individuals in Sri Lanka by-passing public facilities where user fees for health care is zero for private care which is costly both in terms of healthcare and transport.
