There are a number of well-documented studies on the effects of alcohol on the performance of drivers. These studies have shown that alcohol consumption can lead to a decrease in reaction time, a decrease in the ability to maintain lane position, and a decrease in the ability to maintain a steady speed. These effects are more pronounced at higher levels of alcohol consumption and are more likely to occur in more difficult driving situations.

They have also suffered an additional setback with the collapse of the price of oil. They need to diversify.
