It is this, particularly, that distinguishes the American economic organization of firms from European. In fact, as I pointed out above, it is not only American firms that have the highest productivity, but also American firms generally. This is because there is great heterogeneity in productivity in the rest of Europe, and in other countries it is important to distinguish heterogeneity from the number of firms. And it is considerable evidence that, in the United States, the level of productivity of a company is strongly correlated with the size of the company. Such evidence is missing in Europe, and it seems to me particularly important in the context of the discussion of the size and shape of the company, including the role of the firm.
