for a while at home until a doctor suggests time away in a better climate would aid his recovery Vance chooses to stay with relatives the Tracys in a small town not far from New York City his hope is that he might be able to visit the latter during his stay and get his foot in the door of the literary world The Tracys are caretakers for an old house owned by the much wealthier Spear family Vance accompanies his cousins to the house which is in the titular Hudson River Bracketed architectural style In its library he meets a young woman from the Spear family Heloise known as Halo This chance encounter is the first in a series of coincidences that will enable Vance's writerly dreams to take shape Hudson River Bracketed differs from most of Edith Wharton's novels in that its protagonist is both male and materially disadvantaged Having distanced the main character from her own life in these two respects Wharton allowed herself it's widely thought to be more freely autobiographical in portraying her experiences as a fledgling novelist The novel is generally appreciated not so much for the depth of its characters which one contemporary reviewer in the New Statesman said resembled marionettes but for the light it sheds on Wharton's own creative process of fiction writing and her attitude towards the mercenary side of publishing including the exploitation of new writers as a commercial strategy Also notably explored are the many human factors that affect the awarding of literary prizes like the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction which Wharton won in 1921 for The Age of Innocence and which explicitly appears in the novel as the Pulsifer Prize Other themes of the book are the effects of social class and material resources on literary achievement religious and publishing trends marriage and divorce and the majesty of the natural environment in particular the Hudson River Valley In connection with this last focus scholar Judith Saunders has also argued that the book is an extended meditation on the poem Kubla Khan by Samuel Taylor Coleridge which is the subject of Vance and Halo's first verbal exchange Hudson River Bracketed was first serialized without Wharton's permission in 1928 resulting in a frenzied rush to finish it which biographers speculate may have contributed to the illnesses of her final years The novel was published in its entirety in 1929 when Wharton was 67 It's her longest novel and among the five she consistently listed as her favorites within her oeuvre Biographer R W B Lewis reports her having said I am sure it is my best book Critics and readers didn't agree it has never been popular However even its detractors admire her rich descriptions of the Hudson River Valley setting Wharton published a sequel to Hudson River Bracketed in 1932 five years before her death at 75 This book is part of the Standard Ebooks project which produces free public domain ebooks
