Turing's Cathedral George Dyson, 2012-03-06 It is possible to invent a single machine which can be used to compute any computable sequence twenty four year old Alan Turing announced in 1936 In Turing s Cathedral George Dyson focuses on a small group of men and women led by John von Neumann at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton New Jersey who built one of the first computers to realize Alan Turing s vision of a Universal Machine Their work would break the distinction between numbers that mean things and numbers that do things and our universe would never be the same Using five kilobytes of memory the amount allocated to displaying the cursor on a computer desktop of today they achieved unprecedented success in both weather prediction and nuclear weapons design while tackling in their spare time problems ranging from the evolution of viruses to the evolution of stars Dyson s account both historic and prophetic sheds important new light on how the digital universe exploded in the aftermath of World War II The proliferation of both codes and machines was paralleled by two historic developments the decoding of self replicating sequences in biology and the invention of the hydrogen bomb It s no coincidence that the most destructive and the most constructive of human inventions appeared at exactly the same time How did code take over the world In retracing how Alan Turing s one dimensional model became John von Neumann s two dimensional implementation Turing s Cathedral offers a series of provocative suggestions as to where the digital universe now fully three dimensional may be heading next
