These results have important implications for the use of technology in education. They imply teachers' ability to affect the management of change, individual performance, and ultimately to enhance their productivity is not always as predictable as one might expect. Research on the use of technology in education should focus on the ways in which teachers use technology, rather than on the technology itself. The use of technology in education should be seen as a process, rather than as a product. The use of technology in education should be seen as a process that is influenced by a number of factors, including the teacher's beliefs, the school's culture, and the availability of resources. efficiency, it is not an isolated activity. It is, rather, an overall plan for restructuring. People are increasingly aware of corporate goals and objectives, but it is not the strategic plan that provides the leadership, clarity or energy. People have not been trained properly, and even the essential knowledge is missing. As Peters concludes, "It has been said that 'People will do it' and that phrase is one of a product or company's most valued assets. Wrong."

Thomas' terms "selfish" and "egoistic" represent an overstatement. Thomas did not believe that his group's individual interests or concerns were the primary driving force behind the community's development. In fact, he said that the group's primary motivation was the desire to create a new society, one that was more just and more equitable than the one that existed at the time. He also said that the group's members were motivated by a desire to create a new society, one that was more just and more equitable than the one that existed at the time.
