ABSTRACT Concerns about women under-representation in positions of decision making, strategic planning, organizational development and their performance within distance education institutions has been the major focus of debates in higher education. The current study sought to investigate the challenges faced by women in distance education management positions, which were formerly dominated by males. The qualitative study examined and analysed the social, economic, traditional, political and religious factors influencing the degree of women advancement in Open Distance Learning (ODL) senior management positions. Data was collected through face to face interviews with one hundred and twenty staff members employed at the Zimbabwe Open University (ZOU) using the purposive sampling technique. The major finding from the study was that women in senior management positions were affected by these multiple responsibilities which include the gendered nature of society, family influences and culture. The study recommends the holding of open and honest discussion forums on gender and equal rights issues involving both men and women and the development of family friendly culture in universities.

INTRODUCTION

The under-representation of women in senior management positions in higher institutions of learning and indeed other spheres is problematic and has become a major issue of debate in higher education circles (See for example: Nan-Chi 2006; Kiamba 2008; Bilen-Green 2008; Nazemi et al 2012; Zinyemba 2013). The cited literature further indicates that ancient systems of management under which men were assigned a monopoly of access to higher managerial positions of authority and power in organizations and the public sphere, with women restricted to the home, has come under attack in both developed and most developing countries. While efforts seem to be in place to accelerate the advancement of women, the number of women who achieve senior management positions is still disproportionate to the number of women employed in the universities. In the United States, in 2006, women accounted for twenty three percent of college and university presidents, which was up from five percent of presidents in 1975 (Madden 2012), a token improvement of only five percent in more than 30 years! A United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural organisation (UNESCO) report cited in Ramsey (2000) found out that globally, women were grossly under-represented in higher education management with men outnumbering women at about five to one at middle management level and at about twenty to one at senior management level. Closer home in South Africa, survey data on South Africa, cited in Zinyemba (2013) showed that in 2003, the average number of women in senior management was approximately twenty four percent across seventeen institutions of higher learning and that at that point in time there were only three female Vice Chancellors, while eighty two percent of professors were male and only eighteen percent were female.

Notwithstanding the above statistics, a majority of talented and competent women in Zimbabwe and the world over have emerged from the home to occupy senior management positions in educational management. The emergence of women in higher positions of authority or into larger roles in corporate governance in higher education and distance education in par-
