Diabetes Basics

Diabetes is a condition caused by the body's inability to produce or use insulin, a hormone that breaks down sugar molecules in the body for energy, leading to elevated glucose levels. Consistently high glucose levels contributes to many health problems, including heart disease, blindness, renal dysfunction, kidney ailments, and loss of circulation to feet which can lead to amputation. About 25.8 million Americans have diabetes, of which 7 million remain undiagnosed.

Symptoms

- Type I: Unusual thirst, frequent urination, extreme hunger, fatigue, irritability, weight loss & blurry vision.
- Type II: Includes Type I symptoms. Recurring skin, gum and bladder infections, slow healing of cuts and bruises & numbness in hands and feet.

Three Types of Diabetes

- Type I: Your body does not produce enough insulin (5-10% of all cases).
- Type II: "Insulin Resistant" - your body doesn't use insulin properly (90-95% of all cases).
- Gestational Diabetes: Affects pregnant women and can be passed on to the child (about 4%).

How Insulin Works

After digestion, sugars are absorbed into the bloodstream. In response to this increase in blood sugar level, the pancreas secretes insulin, which binds with cells in the body and allows them to absorb and use the sugar properly. Type I diabetics need to get insulin into their bodies themselves, either through injections or insulin pumps. Type II diabetics can sometimes control their diabetes with diet and exercise in addition to oral medication and insulin.

- Use a diet exchange list so you can substitute important nutrients. Check with your doctor or the American Diabetes Association for a list.
- Read food labels religiously.
- Go with low-fat substitutes whenever possible.
- Watch for fat-free desserts high in calories and sugar.
