Developing process guidelines for trauma care in the Netherlands for severely injured patients: results from a Delphi study

Elisabeth Maria Hoogervorst^{1,2,6*}, Eduard Ferdinand van Beeck³, Johan Carel Goslings⁴, Pieter Dirk Bezemer⁵ and Joost Jan Laurens Marie Biersens¹

Abstract

Background: In organised trauma systems the process of care is the key to quality. Nevertheless, the optimal process of trauma care remains unclear due to lack of or inconclusive evidence. Because monitoring and improving the performance of a trauma system is complex, this study aimed to develop consensus-based process guidelines for trauma care in the Netherlands for severely injured patients.

Methods: A five-round Delphi study was conducted with 141 participants that represent all professions involved in trauma care. Sensitivity analyses were carried out to evaluate whether consensus extended across all professions and to detect possible bias.

Results: Consensus was reached on 21 guidelines within 4 categories: timeliness, actions, competent teams and interdisciplinary process. Timeliness guidelines set specific critical limits and definitions for 10 time intervals in the time period from an emergency call until the patient leaves the trauma room. Action guidelines reflect aspects of appropriate care and strongly rely on the international Advanced Trauma Life Support principles. Competence guidelines include flow charts to assess the competence of prehospital and emergency department teams. Essential to competent teams are education and experience of all team members. The interdisciplinary process guideline focuses on cooperation, communication and feedback within and between all professions involved. Consensus was extended across all professions and no bias was detected.

Conclusions: In this Delphi study, a large expert panel agreed on a set of guidelines describing the optimal process of care for severely injured trauma patients in the Netherlands. In addition to time intervals and appropriate actions, these guidelines emphasise the importance of team competence and interdisciplinary processes in trauma care. The guidelines can be seen as a description of a best practice and a new field standard in the Netherlands. The next step is to implement the guidelines and monitor the performance of the Dutch trauma system based on the guidelines.

Background

Quality of trauma care can be defined as achieving the best possible outcome for a given set of clinical circumstances [1]. Quality can be assessed by evaluating the structure of the trauma system, the process of trauma care and the effect of trauma care on the health status of the patient, or the outcome [2]. Worldwide, outcome is well documented in various trauma registries. The structure needed to provide trauma care with the lowest mortality rates is secured in regional trauma systems that have been implemented in many countries. Positive effects of this organisational structure on survival rates have been clearly demonstrated [3-7]. However, as the most optimal structure can only affect outcome through the processes of care that it enables [1], the next step in quality improvement is to describe the processes that would lead to the best possible outcome when applied within the defined structure. The optimal processes
