An Examination of Quality of Life in Women with Compulsive Hair Pulling Chelsea Hetrick Hersperger, 2012 The present study explored how trichotillomania TTM impacts women's lives in a systematic and detailed manner by allowing participants to elaborate on the idiosyncratic ways in which hair pulling affects them across multiple domains Fourteen adult women with a mean age of 22.9 SD 4.8 having met criteria for problematic hair pulling behaviors accompanied by subjective distress and/or impairment completed an online series of self-report questionnaires measuring symptoms related to quality of life QOL anxiety depression and TTM Eight of these women subsequently completed a follow up telephone interview to gather qualitative information regarding the impact of hair pulling on their lives. Severity of symptoms on all measures did not significantly differ for women who completed the interviews compared to those who did not. Quantitative results indicated that TTM did not relate to anxiety, depression, or QOL using typical self-report measures, even though QOL did have an inverse relationship with anxiety and depression. Using grounded theory, six conceptual categories emerged from qualitative analysis of the data as related to women's QOL: Shame and Secrecy, Appearance Relationships, and Trust, Perceived Benefits, and Acceptance. Each of these categories was further broken down into subcategories to facilitate discussion. The results of the present study suggest that hair pulling has positive, negative, and neutral ramifications on women's lives not typically captured by standard inventories measuring QOL. The effects of hair pulling identified in the study have implications on both research and practice.
