Abstract: Three water-treatment systems for low-molecular-weight organic (LMWO) compounds were evaluated. The systems were: (1) a conventional activated carbon (AC) system, (2) a conventional AC system with a pre-oxidation step, and (3) a conventional AC system with a pre-oxidation step and a post-oxidation step. The results showed that the pre-oxidation step significantly improved the removal of LMWO compounds. The post-oxidation step further improved the removal of LMWO compounds. The results also showed that the pre-oxidation step significantly reduced the formation of disinfection by-products (DBPs). The post-oxidation step further reduced the formation of DBPs. The results suggest that the pre-oxidation step is a cost-effective way to improve the removal of LMWO compounds and reduce the formation of DBPs. The post-oxidation step is a more expensive way to improve the removal of LMWO compounds and reduce the formation of DBPs.
