

Bearings and Trigonometry

Key Knowledge

- finding bearings
- finding a back bearing
- using trigonometric functions
- using right-angled trigonometry to find a missing side or angle
- finding why using the sine and cosine rules

A bearing is a way of describing the direction of travel. They are always given as a clockwise angle from North and are always written using three figures (000° and 360°).

Traditionally, the combination of bearings and trigonometry were used to measure at sea and allowed ships to travel accurately when out of sight of land on long routes of the open ocean. But the concept of a sailing ship would have to be very big, without a solution is now only dealt with at university level (maths), but now, trigonometry and bearings are a choice to solve a variety of navigation – both land and water routes.

Example 1: The bearing of Birkhead from Humberfield is 140° and the distance between them is a straight line is 10 km. How far east of Humberfield is Birkhead? Give your answer correct to 1 significant figure.

When dealing with unknown directions, it is easy to make yourself a right-angled triangle. Here, we can just extend our north line down from Humberfield, and draw a line east to the right-hand side line to Birkhead.

We are looking for the length of the base (i.e. the base the length of the hypotenuse (10 km). We can use the bearing to find the angle inside the triangle at Humberfield, using the fact that angles in a straight line add to 180°.

$$180 - 140 = 40^\circ$$

We know the length of the hypotenuse and after looking for the length of the opposite side, we can use sine:

$$\sin \theta = \frac{\text{opposite}}{\text{hypotenuse}}$$

$$\sin 40^\circ = \frac{\text{opposite}}{10}$$

$$\text{opposite} = 10 \sin 40^\circ$$
