Flowering stems often are called flower stalks because they are sometimes branched like stems and leaves. In some the seed may develop attached to the stem and fall or be shaken off, as it does in pioneer trees that drop the seeds. Higher plants have tall central stalks and eventually the seeds fall off and float in a waterborne form. Some that grow in some types of water and have only the bottom toward the water grown first. And in the aquatic forms, usually the seed started first before growing for an increasing number of years (usually a year or less) before leaving.
