

Writing Effective Letters of Recommendation for Rhodes, Truman... and Beyond

It's tempting to think that exceptional grades, exemplary participation in campus and extracurricular activities, and a strong scholarship application will speak for themselves. However, given the level of competition for Rhodes, Truman, NSF, Mellon, and other national fellowships, this is simply not true.

Each year, approximately 600 candidates are nominated for 80 Truman Scholarships; 1,200 to 1,400 candidates apply for Rhodes and Marshall Scholarships. Thirty-two are chosen as Rhodes Scholars; forty become Marshall Scholars. Selection of finalists is based on a candidate's personal statement, academic record, and letters of recommendation. Quite simply, the committees aim to select the very best scholar leaders from across the United States.

Virtually every candidate who is nominated by his or her university has a 3.7+ GPA, a fairly extensive record of leadership and community service, and has demonstrated the potential for future success through research, creative work, early involvement in government or professional activities ... the list goes on. Often, little separates the very good candidates from the outstanding candidates—on paper. Letters of recommendation can be the decisive factor in a committee's decision to advance a candidate to the interview. The letters, therefore, are critical to the candidate's chances for success in the competition.

Your letter must be a very special one, written especially for this student and for this competition. The best letters are from 1 1/2 to 2 1/2 pages in length, and take several hours, often more than a day to write. You may find it helpful to sit down with the candidate and discuss his or her academic work, extracurricular activities, and future educational and career goals.

An effective letter will:

- State how long, and in what capacity you've known the candidate.
- Describe the candidate's personality and work ethic, using concrete examples that demonstrate a strong relationship.
- Be vivid and specific, including personal memories of the candidate, suggestive anecdotes, something to indicate that you know this candidate very well and think highly of him or her. Letters that matter to selection committees bring the candidate to life on the page.
- Describe and evaluate in detail the student's scholarly work, especially a major research project. The letter should help the selection committee understand the significance of this research, the contribution it has made, and include examples of the student's ability to make future contributions as a scientist, policy maker, environmentalist, etc.
