Chapter 5

Highway Safety

5.1

Explain the difference between short-term and long-term driver expectancy, and provide an example of each.

Expectancy is the ability of drivers to rely on past experience to assist with control, guidance, or navigation tasks. When driver expectancy is taking into consideration in the design of roadways, the negative effect of the driver's limitations in processing information is reduced because drivers only need to process new information.

Examples of long-term expectancies are:

- Freeway exists are located on the right-hand side of the road
- At an intersection of a major and minor road controlled by a stop sign, the stop sign is on the approaches of the road that appears to be the minor road
- At an intersection approach, a driver wishing to turn left will be in the left lane or on a through lane that allows left-turns

Examples of short-term expectancies:

- A long section of roadway with gently winding characteristics is contiguous with a roadway section that has gentle curves
- A long section of roadway that allows for high speed driving is contiguous with a roadway sections that also allows for high speed driving
- Driving at a consistent speed along a well coordinated system of traffic signals on an arterial should not suddenly lead to an isolated intersection with a significantly different cycle length

5.2

Briefly explain the steps in the roadway safety management process as outlined in the Highway Safety Manual.
