There is an urgent need to rethink relationships between systems of government and those who are governed. This book explores ways of rethinking those relationships by bringing communities normally excluded from decision making to centre stage, to experiment with new methods of regulating for engagement. Using original co-produced research, it innovatively shows how we can better use a bottom-up approach to design regulatory regimes that recognise the capabilities of communities at the margins and powerfully support the knowledge, passions, and creativity of citizens. The authors provide essential guidance for all those working on co-produced research to make impactful change. Cultural History and Education Thomas Popkewitz, 2001-03-21.
