

Section One: Close Reading

General points

The first section of the Literature examination tests your skills of textual analysis. Being able to analyse examples of poetry, prose and drama is critical to the successful completion of this course, so it is important to consider the close reading skills you will need in this section.

A mistake that many students make when completing this section is that they select the text that best fits with their plans for Section Two of the exam. That often means, for example, that they really want to write on their studied novel and play, so the result is that they will indiscriminately select the poetry text in Section One. This is not a successful approach. You should be equally prepared to write about all of the texts you have studied; while you may have a preference for particular texts, you should enter the exam and make the best choices for the paper in front of you.

Another error that students often make is beginning the close reading section with a plan to create a particular 'alternative' reading of the text, such as a gender or Marxist reading. This is problematic, as the text may not lend itself to this particular type of reading and, in trying to force one, you may be missing an opportunity for a successful close reading. Close reading itself is a reading practice – to use this reading strategy well is a complex task. To apply two reading practices in the time allocated for this section is incredibly challenging.

Approaching the text

Below is a series of points that should help you to prepare for a close reading of any text that may appear in an examination paper. Read through all of the texts in the paper and make your choice based on the following considerations:

- What do I think are the main ideas of each text?
- How does each text represent people, places and events?
- What are the main generic and language conventions of each text?
- Can I make any observations about context in these texts?
- Does my context play an important role in my response to any of these texts?
- Can I make any useful or significant connections to other texts?
- Am I resistant to the dominant reading of any of these texts?
- Would it make an interesting or striking case if I applied a specific reading strategy?

When you have completed this process, consider which text offers the best possibilities for a thoughtful and well-evidenced reading. Then, annotate your chosen text, plan what you now wish to say about the text logically and select useful examples. Remember, use of textual evidence accounts for almost a quarter of your marks here. Use evidence extensively. There's no excuse not to: the text is right there in front of you!
