

TYPES OF SELECTION IN POPULATIONS

Graph A

The distribution of the traits in the altered population differs from the original population in that the selected value has decreased (smaller, shorter,

Graph B

The population has changed so that more individuals have the average value of the trait compared to the original population.

Graph C

Two altered traits appear, each reflecting the two distinct variations of the original population.

Each graph compares the normal distribution of a trait in the original population with the distribution of the trait in the population altered by natural selection.

In the space provided next to each number, write the letter of the graph that illustrates the type of natural selection described.

- _____ 1. Directional Selection: natural selection that results in a change among the traits of a population in one direction.
- _____ 2. Disruptive Selection: natural selection that results in a change among the traits of a population in two directions; could lead to two new populations.
- _____ 3. Stabilizing selection: natural selection that favors the average individuals.

For each scenario below, determine which graph above best depicts the situation.

- _____ 4. A large valley is flooded and a population of lizards is separated. Over time, they travel in opposite directions to two different places and eventually become so different they can no longer interbreed.
- _____ 5. In a population of wheat, variation in the height of the wheat decreases over time.
- _____ 6. In a population of field mice, there are many variations of brown, ranging from a very light brown to a very dark brown. The population becomes more of a medium-brown over time, as individuals that best blend in to their surroundings are favored.
