

But the World Wars were not the only conflict to affect public health in Britain in the 20th century. The long and drawn out Second Boer War (1899-1902) revealed health issues in the British army. As a much larger and stronger force, it was not able to defeat the South Africans for a whole three years.

Therefore, in the wake of the Second Boer War, the Committee on Physical Deterioration was created in 1903 to study the health of the British populace and to determine why so many recruits had been of ill health.

- The Committee on Physical Deterioration's research paved the way for the 1906 Liberals' reforms in public health including the first National Health Insurance scheme.
- While they were not in themselves comprehensive or universal in coverage, these public health reforms formed important stepping stones towards more comprehensive ones in the 1940s.

- The main reason the World Wars had such a huge impact on public health in the 20th century was that there were simply many more people to care for than in peacetime.
- The other was that conscription, which began in 1916 during WWI, revealed that the levels of health across the country were still, despite the Liberals' reforms, very poor.
