Welcome to the guide to better anthropological thinking. If you are reading this, you should already be familiar with my booklet The Anthropology Student Guide to Better Grades. You should know how to take notes, listen in class, ask questions effectively, and write answers to exam questions. At least you should be working to improve your ability to do those things.

Improving your study skills is a constant task. Even professors have to work at it. But you also need some skills that go beyond the mechanics of note-taking. You need to teach yourself how to think anthropologically. In this booklet, I will offer suggestions on how to improve your skills in this area.

At the outset, you need to put one reminder into each section of what follows: because we are talking about ideas and methods, you will find differences and disagreements among teachers and in different books and articles on anthropology. One of the most fundamental principles of scientific thinking is that everything is tentative and subject to revision. If your instructor presents things differently from what I am about to suggest, don't be surprised and don't be worried. Just learn what you are taught and then think about whether the material in the following pages can be applied to it. You may find you have some ideas of your own or some criticisms of your teachers' views. You may eventually decide to criticize me. I won't be surprised and I won't be offended. I won't even grade you down—as long as you show understanding of the basic principles of anthroPoLOGICAL THINKING.

Need Help With Logic?

I strongly recommend anthropology students take at least one philosophy course. Any of the following are likely to give you experience with logical thinking:
