

Your Child's Hearing Loss

by Evelyn Williams, MS, CCC-A &
Tina R. Mullins, MA, MSW,
CCC-A

My child failed a hearing screening. What does that mean?

A hearing screening provides pass/fail information on your child's ability to hear sounds at a certain loudness level and at specific pitches.

What should I do if my child fails a hearing screening?

See an ASHA-certified audiologist (CCC-A) for a comprehensive audiological assessment of your child's hearing and middle ear function. An audiologist evaluating a child typically uses certain basic procedures to determine if the child has a hearing loss and, if so, the type and degree of the loss. These procedures may include a pure tone hearing test, speech audiometry, and tests of middle ear function. Depending on the age and/or the child's ability to reliably respond to these procedures, hearing sensitivity may be determined using tests that do not require the active participation of your child (e.g., auditory evoked potentials, otoacoustic emissions). Based on the results of an audiological assessment, the audiologist will provide information regarding the impact your child's type and degree of hearing loss may have on communication, learning, and social skills. An audiologist will also provide you with recommendations for intervention and appropriate referrals (e.g., speech-language pathology, medical, educational).

What are the Different Types of Hearing Loss?

There are four basic types of hearing loss:

- Conductive – hearing loss resulting from disorders of the outer and/or middle ear (e.g., resulting from ear infections, abnormal ear structures).
- Sensorineural – hearing loss resulting from disorders of the inner ear or the 8th cranial nerve that carries the auditory signals.

An audiologist evaluating a child typically uses certain basic procedures to determine if the child has a hearing loss and, if so, the type and degree of the loss.

to the brain (e.g., resulting from meningitis, noise exposure, problems at birth).

- Mixed – a combination of conductive and sensorineural hearing loss.
- Central – results from disorders of the central auditory nervous system (e.g., auditory processing disorders).

What are Some Implications of Hearing Loss?

Communication development and behavioral skills are influenced by a child's ability to hear. Hearing loss can also effect a child's social interaction, emotional development, and academic performance.

Audiologic Implications

Hearing loss may be bilateral (both ears) or unilateral (one ear). Hearing loss may be fluctuating, permanent, or temporary.

Children can exhibit:

- varying degrees of difficulty hearing and understanding environmental and speech sounds
- significant problems listening and understanding in noisy and reverberant environments

Communication Implications

Children typically exhibit delays and/or difficulty with:

- tasks involving language concepts;
- auditory attention and memory; and comprehension;
- receptive and expressive language;
