situation in the animal body In the future we should determine biomedical markers for use in precision veterinary medicine In human medicine this has been practiced with great success The problem however is that we are getting to know more and more substances produced by mold fungi This causes a build up of new interpretative problems causing health conditions diagnosis as well as analytical problems To fully understand the results we need new techniques to assess toxicological and chemical hazards including those related to undesirable substances We need a solid knowledge of the biological pathways underlying the toxicity and tolerance to interference factors toxicological processes We hope that the presented study will allow for a better understanding of mycotoxicoses that bother us and our animals which will allow for more effective preventive actions
