academic education system after 9th grade Class Work explores the consequences for youth who have failed these exams through an examination of two urban vocational schools in Nanjing China Through a close look at the students backgrounds experiences the schools they attend and their trajectories into the workforce T E Woronov explores the value systems in contemporary China that stigmatize youth in urban vocational schools as failures and the political and economic structures that funnel them into working class futures She argues that these marginalized students and schools provide a privileged window into the ongoing complex intersections between the socialist and capitalist modes of production in China today and the rapid transformation of China s cities into post industrial service based economies This book advances the notion that urban vocational schools are not merely holding tanks for academic failures instead they are incipient sites for the formation of a new working class
