Tibetan Buddhists in the Making of Modern China. By GRAY TUTTLE.
New York: Columbia University Press, 2005. xviii, 337 pp. $45.00 (cloth).
doi: 10.1017/S0021911807000319

The popularity of Tibetan Buddhism has been well established in the West for some time. Less recognized, perhaps, is the growing interest in Tibetan Buddhism not only in China but also throughout Southeast Asia in areas with substantial Chinese populations. Indeed, Tibetan Buddhist ideas have been in circulation in China for some time, at least since the Yuan dynasty. In his timely publication, Gray Tuttle offers a unique and refreshing account of the role of Tibetan Buddhism during the formative years of the modern Chinese nation.

Scholars studying the formation of the Chinese nation-state and nationalism generally stress the secular nature of this project. Alternatives proposed by Chinese intellectuals who were not persuaded by Western secular models are rarely discussed. Tuttle's book presents evidence that there was a sizable group of Chinese intellectuals who sought different options for forging Chinese nationhood and that the source of these alternatives was Buddhism in general and Tibetan Buddhism in particular.

The book's main argument is that Tibetan Buddhism provided an ideological basis for those desiring both the spiritual unity of China and Tibet and their political integration. The downfall of the Qing dynasty saw the virtual collapse of Chinese influence and authority in Tibet. For Chinese nationalists, the recovery of Tibet became part of their nation-building project. In this process, Tuttle argues, Buddhism was understood as both the key to enticing Tibet back into the Chinese fold, as well as a powerful alternative to Westernization.

In the long history of relations between China and Tibet, the question of the role of Buddhism has been a perplexing issue. Past scholars saw Chinese dynastic patronage of Tibetan Buddhism as superficial and utilitarian—indeed, primarily a means of pacifying the turbulent Mongol groups. Lately, there has been a growing recognition of its deep penetration into late imperial Chinese cultural life, with scholars acknowledging that court participation in Tibetan Buddhism may have been more sincere than earlier studies admit. Nevertheless, these studies still imply that during late imperial China, the practice of Tibetan Buddhism was mainly confined to the court and gentry. By contrast, it appears from Tuttle's account that Tibetan Buddhism achieved a considerable degree of penetration at all levels of society during the Republican period, and it also supplied a compelling alternative to Westernization and a shared space for
