Abstract—The authors examined the effects of a 6-week training program on the self-reported health status of older adults. The study was conducted in a community center in New York City. The participants were 60 older adults (mean age = 78.5 years) who had no history of heart disease, diabetes, or other chronic conditions. They were randomly assigned to either a control group or a treatment group. The treatment group received a 6-week training program consisting of three sessions per week. Each session included a 15-minute warm-up, a 30-minute aerobic exercise routine, and a 15-minute cool-down. The control group did not receive any training. At baseline and at the end of the 6-week period, all participants completed a self-report questionnaire about their health status. The results showed that the treatment group reported significantly better health status than the control group at the end of the 6-week period. These findings suggest that a 6-week training program can improve the self-reported health status of older adults.

These data are the complete set of data for the 1990-1991 season. The data are available for the 1990-1991 season only.

There are several factors that may affect the results of this study. First, the study was conducted in a single center, which may limit the generalizability of the findings. Second, the study was a cross-sectional study, which may not capture the changes in the prevalence of the disease over time. Third, the study was a self-reported study, which may be subject to recall bias. Fourth, the study was a convenience sample, which may not represent the general population. Finally, the study was a small study, which may not have enough statistical power to detect small differences.
