Curtis,Steadman Upham,2006 Edward Sherriff Curtis spent more than forty years photographing and documenting the Native peoples of North America taking more than 40 000 photographs and amassing a staggering archive of documentary material about North American tribes and social groups While many books have explored the artistic value of the images he created The Many Faces of Edward Sherriff Curtis assesses his contributions to the field of anthropology Curtis began documenting the Native peoples of North America in 1889 By this time the U S government had pushed most Native Americans onto reservations and seemed determined to destroy their cultures and social organizations by forcibly removing their children to government boarding schools by depriving them of the right to speak their languages and practice their religions and by carving up tribal lands into ever smaller portions and giving away sizable pieces to non Natives Curtis believed that his generation might be the last to see and hear these Native people in the flesh Scholars Steadman Upham and Nat Zappia examine eighty of Curtis s portraits within three contexts the
