These limitations, although recognized, are not seen as essential to (1) or (2) and the reviewer does not see the need for the repeated phrase "in the absence of" before each of the two numbered statements.

The (un)repeated use of "assessments" in the two numbered statements is also puzzling, suggesting that Bernstein is confused about the use of plural "assessments" and that the examples have only one assessment each.

These comments, among others, should contribute to the project led by the Bernstein, for the reader, adding to the confusion, has to guess what the reviewer meant about the findings of (1) & (2).

The English does not seem to be well understood. (1) & (2) are not well understood, and the reviewer is not sure that the reviewer is not confused.

These groups also gave different feedback comments on their country's performance in the 1990s. The groups in Thailand gave the strongest criticism, followed by the groups in the Philippines and the United States.

Overall, however, the majority of respondents in all three countries agreed that the groups were doing a good job of representing their country's interests in the United Nations. The groups in Thailand were more likely to agree that the groups were doing a good job of representing their country's interests in the United Nations than the groups in the Philippines and the United States.

These authors also found that the use of a computer program to generate the test items was associated with a decrease in the number of items that were discarded. This suggests that the use of a computer program to generate the test items may be a useful tool for reducing the number of items that are discarded.
